

This is a Science Fiction novelette (12965 words 10 Chapters) Description: In this UNUSUAL story, a policeman discovers a strange informant and sets out to solve a murder that hasn't even been reported. The paranormal world and a by-the-book policeman come together as a recently murdered girl's apparition reaches out to him in a plea to find her body. Find me, she whispered out of thin air from the back seat of his car--but she wasn't really there when he turned around. Excerpt: I knew I had seen and heard the image of a young woman in the back of my cruiser. But why me? Why did she appear to me and who was she? I knew I couldn't let it rest. After I got to sleep I had a restless night, tossing and turning. Finally I fell into a peaceful deep sleep until I started dreaming. My gaze moved toward the front of the class where the teacher dressed in a red dress and gold belt had her back turned and was writing something on a blackboard. It looked like gibberish. She finished writing several lines of gibberish, turned around slowly to face the class and I saw it was the girl who had appeared in the back of my car. As soon as her gaze caught mine she crossed her arms and immediately I could see the piece of chalk she had been writing with, extending out from the grasp of the fingers on her right hand. Blood was dripping from the very end of it slowly down her hand and onto the floor. I heard the sound as the drops hit the floor almost like the sound of a ticking clock. Then I woke up. I couldn't get over the feeling I had in my dream that I had somewhere to go, but I didn't know where. There are some tasks that you know you have to start even though they hadn't been in your scheme of things and even though you may not even know exactly what they are. Winston Churchill once said something about being figuratively tapped on the shoulder and offered the chance to do a special thing. I guess I had been figuratively tapped on the shoulder.
